Task 1.

... ~~Though~~ Although "Knock" spawned an array of imitations, trying to capitalize on the striking style and the ~~fast of~~ ~~effort~~ comparatively low amount of effort required to convey one's idea through ~~its~~ ^{solid style} worthy successors followed. There were so many, in fact, that countless competitions were held, listing extreme brevity as a requirement for the entrants' stories. As a result of one of such events (namely, 55 Fiction by Steve Moss) ~~lasted~~ the compilation of 'short literary works "The World's Shortest Stories of Love and Death"' was released in 1999 by the host of the competition. It features a selection of the most outstanding submissions, all each of them adhering to the guidelines: every story contains fifty-five or fewer words, has a setting, at least one character, a conflict and a resolution.

The book contains some truly commendable and impactful stories. For instance, "Gratitude" by Andrew E. Hunt is a powerful critique of our society's materialistic values and disregard for the poor. "Higher Education" by Ron Past is also focused on a similar topic, tackling the shift away from ~~high~~ ^{quality} education. Hope A. Torres' "In the Garden" is, perhaps, the most straightforward of them all, also talking about the issue of materialism.

But for every great story there are many poorly-written ones. A reader is sure to find many works in the book ~~that~~ ^{which} simply repeat the same message; some fail to make any emotional impact; others turn out to be far too allegoric, seeming to be riddles and not stories. I, myself, did not enjoy reading the book at all.

In conclusion, I still recommend it to anyone interested in literature. ^{Albeit,} Not as a book for ~~his~~ leisure. ~~It~~ It truly
