... To engage writers into working in an increasingly popular genre, a competition called '55 Fiction' was launched by Steve Moss in 1987. From them on, a new tradition has emerged in the literary world, and the annual competition is held in 'New Times'. According to the contest rules, a participating story must have not more than fifty-five words, and & its storyline is to follow the traditional layout; in other words, it includes an introduction to a conflict which in the end is resolved by the story's characters

In 1599, the best works were published in Steve Moss's book the World's Shortest Stories of Love and Death'

The book turned out to be a shelf-hitting bestseller, and manifold stories conquered people's hearts. Even though they make Readers picture themselves in difficult situations and face hansh reality, the stonies do not lack humour or igony at all. Most of them are real-life conversations, whereas there at one also examples of an inner monologue and self-questioning.

I strongly believe that the book deserves its great success. This collection of stories deals with a wide range of essential issues such as education, trust, kindness and generosity. The stories let readers think carefully of the true nature of all the good and bad things that happen to them. Some works are not only thought-provoking but also inspiring changes in Readers' attitude to the issues covered.

is worth being familiarised with. However, if you are under fourteen, I would not recommend you to go deep into the book's contents. It is not the stylistic diversity and sophisticated language that make the Stories unsuitable for young readers, but the tricky questions raised by the authors which can encourage only mature readers to challenge their perception.
